

applications in the field

When the Dawson County Humane Society ran out of money for air conditioning, MovinCool donated these portable cooling systems to help keep animals and workers cool during the summer months.

Company donates portable units to animal shelter

When the Dawson County Humane Society in Dawsonville, Ga., opened the area's first animal shelter in April, they ran out of money before air conditioning could be installed in the dog kennels.

"Our budget was limited, and something had to be cut," said Brenda Lee, a shelter volunteer and member of the humane society's board of directors. "If we had waited to secure more funds, we would have had to delay opening, and without a shelter in our county, the animals had nowhere to go."

As summer approached and temperatures started to climb into the 90s, the lack of air conditioning presented a serious problem.

"The dogs were miserable. They were just lying there panting," said Lee. "The staff was having a pretty tough time, too."

Determined to find a solution, Lee contacted MovinCool, a maker of portable air conditioners. The company responded by donating three of its high-output units, which are designed for quick installation in emergency situations.

"We are very grateful that MovinCool came to our rescue," said Lee. "We hooked up two of the air conditioners as soon as we got them. The difference was like night and day. Now the dogs are keeping cool, and so are the humans."

"MovinCool air conditioners are mainly used to cool people and equipment, but there is no reason they can't cool animals, too," said John Doran, MovinCool senior manager of heat management and customer service. "We are very glad to contribute to such a worthy cause as this." ■